Excerpt: . . . swooping from the pole, And far above his utmost reach The crested billows roll. O, wild and frantic energy, No succour for thee there I O, bitter, bitter agony That yields to blank despair I LOST OVERBOARD. O, fierce tumultuous sea of thoughts, Love, sorrow, fear, and doubt I That heave and surge and boil within, Like those wild waves without. They say that in that awful hour Before approaching death, When drowning wretches toss their arms And catch convulsive breath, --That all the pictured past appears Before their swimming eyes, All hopes and loves and joys and fears, In clear and living guise: And white-robed figures, all serene, That beckon back to life; And drifting shapes of darker mien That mock their fruitless strife. Tis souls unfetterd energy That crowds into an hour Whole ages of clear imagery, --Such is its god-like power. This too is over; all is past Of human strength or skill; The weary body rests at last, But to the spirit still Some moments more of prayer belong; --Far other vistas ope, --Prayer waxing fervent, full and strong; Then faith, and serene hope. For he deaths ghastly gaze hath met, A1ld paid him all his dues, And cancelld all the mighty debt Which no man may refuse. No more he stoops to flee, tappease, Pale face and quivering limb; Death and despair and raging seas Can wring no more from him I Gentle oblivion lulld his brain; And in that...
