Excerpt: . . . whether the crop, as a whole, was fairly represented by the sample and whether it was fit for malting purposes. The defendant contradicted the statement of the plaintiff and his witnesses that the sample identified by Henry Lehrkind was the one left with plaintiff at the brewery. Several witnesses who had seen defendant's sample corroborated the defendant on this point, and also in his statement that a sample which he exhibited to the jury was the same in quality and appearance as the one left with plaintiff. On these points the evidence was in hopeless conflict. It was conceded on both sides that good brewing barley, as this expression is understood by brewers, was so scarce by reason of an early frost in Gallatin county, that very little was obtainable in the market at Bozeman. There was evidence tending to show that such barley as that offered by the defendant could be and was used for malting purposes. Besides this, there is some basis in the evidence for the inference that the plaintiff refused to accept delivery, not because the crop was not equal in quality to the sample exhibited to and left with him, but because he had concluded that he could not make profitable use of that quality of barley. The evidence properly presented a question for the Jury, under the instructions, as to whether the parties used the expression in its technical sense or to mean barley of the quality represented...
