Excerpt: . . . discriminating, and judging them. 1 It is therefore functionally different from sense-perception. Such also seems to be the meaning of Epicurus statement: 4 It must be understood that human nature⁵ is taught and constrained by things and events themselves in various ways; but thought afterwards investigates exactly and makes additional discoveries in what is intrusted to it. In this manner the free activity of reasoning on the part of the individual was admitted and an approach to the recognition of a subjective attitude was made, as not only objects of cognition, but the mental processes as such were studied.
