Cheyne-Stokes respiration; a pathological condition in which breathing is periodic, a pause of to $ of a minute being followed by an ascending and descending staircase of respirations. A somewhat similar form of respiration can be produced in animals by dividing the medulla transversely. Division of the vagi removes the periodicity, irregular spasms taking its place. Hibernating animals take a deep breath, followed by shallow breaths and then a pause. On the other hand, if CO₂ accumulates in alveolar air to the amount of about 8 /o, its further exit from the blood becomes impossible. In a confined space, therefore, even though it contain nothing but oxygen to start with, death occurs from accumulation of CO₂. 2. Carbonic acid is a narcotic poison. Hence the violent convulsions produced by deficiency of oxygen are not seen when the blood is saturated with carbonic acid. This...
